The S.W.A.T. Minion's Tip: Web Addresses (URLs)

Q: When we visit a website using our favorite browser, we usually just type in the basic part of the URL and 'arrive' at the desired location without any problems. But have we reached a point where we can start omitting 'www' from the URLs for all websites now, or is it still necessary to add it in?

A: The short answer: "Maybe."

This has nothing to do with the browser; it has to do with the web-server. The web-server is a computer (or even multiple computers) which receives queries for webpages and sends the appropriate data. A URL includes several parts, one of which is the name or address of the web-server.

Many companies host more than just a webserver; they may also run an FTP-server, a database server, a mail server, and so on. These could be hosted from the same machine as the webserver or they may be on different machines.

In the past, it was common to specify the difference via a prefix for consistency. So for example, Acme Industries might buy the domain-name 'acme.org', and then set up one or more computers to host the different services they have. When you want to use one of the services, you enter the appropriate host name:

www.acme.org - Acme's web-site
ftp.acme.org - Acme's file server sql.acme.org - Acme's database server pop.acme.org - Acme's incoming mail server
smtp.acme.org - Acme's outgoing mail server

So why does it still work without 'www'? Because most web servers accept different URLs, and redirect them as necessary. It's becoming less and less necessary to include 'www', but it is not universal, and some sites still require it because it helps keep things organized.

Most of the time we can happily (and easily) omit typing in the 'www' portion of URLs for our favorite websites, but there is always a possibility you may encounter the 'rare' website that still requires it.
