

Clarion University Policy for Use of Calculators in Mathematics Classes

Clarion University of Pennsylvania recognizes that learning disabilities for students are a serious concern and is committed to doing everything within the law to make reasonable accommodations. However, the university also recognizes that the ability to perform basic arithmetic without the aid of a calculator is an important factor in certain degree programs and career paths. It is fully the right of the discipline and instructors teaching courses in mathematics to decide when and where calculators are permissible as to prepare students accordingly.
